Push Feel

For the price that the Ajazz x Huano Peaches command, these are honestly incredibly well constructed linears in terms of push feel. While they are smooth in an overall sense, there is still a bit of subtle scratch that provides just enough character other than the feeling of the lube on its own. As for the housing collisions, they're decently well balanced, firm, and solid feeling though that begins to wane a bit under higher activation speeds.

Wobble

The average Peach switch of the batch that I received had a potentially noticeable amount of stem wobble in the N/S direction and an ever so slightly greater amount in the E/W direction. Much like their release partner in the Banana switches, though, they suffer from an incredibly wide range of variability of wobble across the batch making it hard to pin down a description.

Sound

For coming in the ever-concerning housing combination of polycarbonate over nylon, the Peach switches do an incredible job of having firm, thick, and relatively mid-pitched top and bottom housing collisions with little if any noise at all from the scratch of the switches. Much like with the push feel, though, this begins to creep more towards the 'higher pitched plasticky' noise vibe with faster and faster activation speeds.

Context

While not the most readily accessible of switches to the community at large, this second release in the Fresh Fruit line from a revitalized and revamped Huano is really both historically neat but also a great bang-for-buck option for the community out there, all things considered.

Other

The Peaches really demonstrate that the Banana switches were not blind luck and that new Huano switches are actually quite impressively made. How they will develop from here, as well as how they will continue pack in the features has me quite excited for their future.
